Nomination Procedures

Nomination Process

The Nomination Process must involve the means for identifying students or recent graduates applying to graduate school and then a way of identifying from among those students who best to put forward as nominees. Recall that students with bachelor's degrees as far back as April 2015, are eligible. (Please see the brochure for eligibility.) Nomination procedures might fall into one of the three following models:

Model 1: If you represent a school that expects to identify few nominees, a nomination committee consisting of the network representatives and pertinent administrators should canvass deans or heads of humanities and arts departments to determine and then contact potential nominees. If those students agree to be nominees, their names would then be sent to the LFP office by November 12.

Model 2: If your school already has a process for identifying and nominating students for nationally competitive fellowships like the Rhodes, the Marshall, and others, this same process or committee could oversee the selection of nominees for the Lilly Graduate Fellows Program, provided that those involved in this process understand the aims and mission of the LFP and the Graduate Fellows Program.

Model 3: If you anticipate having a large pool of potential nominees, the network representatives and pertinent administrators will need to establish a competitive process for determining the nominees. This process might include canvassing department heads or deans to determine which students are applying for graduate school in humanities or the arts, then creating a committee and process for evaluating application materials such as those listed in the accompanying brochure along with writing samples and the like. Through a series of cuts, a final group of three nominees would be submitted to the LFP office by November 12.
